

Effects on a Relationship

The pressure of being in a relationship can feel overwhelming to someone living with depression and, can be frustrating and emotionally draining trying to maintain a relationship with someone who's depressed. These feelings and reactions can damage relationships, whether they're with spouses, partners, children or friends.

Each year, depression affects an estimated 21 million Americans and countless numbers of loved ones.<sup>1</sup>

When you're struggling with an illness that makes you tired, sad and generally uninterested in life, often the last thing on your mind are the needs of others. It can test even the most secure of relationships. The good news is that depression is very treatable and by taking the appropriate steps to combat the illness, your relationship can survive.

Steps to overcome depression

The most important step toward successful recovery is to seek treatment. With the appropriate combination of therapy and medication, people with depression can feel better and reconnect with life and with relationships.

If you're experiencing symptoms of depression:

- Share your feelings with others as much as possible. Your reluctance to talk about how you feel only creates distance between you and your loved ones. It's especially important to keep the lines of communication open during trying times.
- Let your partner know that you still find him or her attractive. An affectionate touch and a few reassuring words can mean a lot, even if you don't feel inclined toward more intimate relations.

1. Ranking America's mental health.
www.mentalhealthamerica.net/go/state-ranking

Contact Us

Your program provides access to tools and other resources online or call us directly to speak to a professional counselor who is available everyday and at any time to provide confidential assistance at no cost to you.

Visit MagellanHealth.com/member

Resources

Mental Health America

www.nmha.org

National Institute of Mental Health

www.nimh.nih.gov

- Consider couples or family counseling. Your willingness to talk about your relationship and how it may be affected by depression speaks volumes to family members and loved ones about their importance in your life.
- Keep working toward recovery. Today's treatment options make that more realistic than ever.
- To resolve your symptoms, a combination of medication and therapy may be recommended. Your physician will help you determine the right levels of medication and how long you should stay on them. Talk with your partner about your treatment plan and visit with your provider.
- Although you may be prepared to do anything and everything to help, don't try to take over the life of someone who is depressed. Your loved one may seem overwhelmed, incapable or frustrated, but you can't reconstruct his or her life.
- Give advice in the form of options. For example, recommend a physician for your partner to see or suggest support groups you think may be a step toward alleviating his or her symptoms, and offer to go with them.
- Remember that depression is a real illness that should be taken seriously. Don't belittle the person by saying things such as "Snap out of it," "Get over it" or "Everyone feels down now and then." Try your best to understand the illness.

If you're in a relationship with someone experiencing depression:

- Remember, your role is to offer support and encourage your loved one to seek professional help. Encourage your partner not to settle for partial improvement and explain that with the right treatment, people with depression can regain their lives.
- Recognize that depression is not rational. It is painful to be rejected, scorned or ignored, but this may be how your loved one responds to your efforts to help.
- Care for yourself. Carve out time to pursue your own interests and to socialize even when your partner can't join you. You might also want to consider seeking individual counseling.

US Army Reserve Psychological Health Program

www.usarphp.org